While L.A. burned, Bass' messages d fred

[Bass, from B1]
not producing the records.

On Friday, responding to questions from The Times, Michaelson said that Bass' phone auto-deletes text messages and has for at least two years.

Los Angeles Administrative Code Section 12.3(b)(6) dictates that most records "shall be retained for a minimum of two years unless a shorter period is otherwise permitted by law or a longer period is otherwise required by law, or unless, consistent with state law, a different period of retention is established by order or resolution of the Council."

Michaelson argued that Section 12.3(b)(6) does not apply to texts, relying on a state attorney general opinion from 1981, long before text messages became a commonplace means of communicating.

"As articulated in an Attorney General opinion, a record that must be retained is made for the purpose of providing future reference," Michaelson wrote in an email. "Texts are ephemeral types of electronic communication, to use Supreme Court words, that afford 'fleeting thoughts and random bits of information' that provide an 'ease and immediacy.' Texts are not intended to provide future reference for the author or recipient let alone a public official record."

The Supreme Court decision cited by Michaelson, however, held that San José public officials' text messages on personal phones were public records that had to be disclosed if they related to government business. The state public records act has no specific provisions for document retention.

GENARO MOLINA Los Angeles Times

L.A. MAYOR Karen Bass faced criticism for being abroad when the fires erupted. The Times sought records from that period, but a city lawyer says her phone has been set to auto-delete texts for at least two years.

First Amendment Coalition Legal Director David Loy disagreed with Michaelson's interpretation and argued that the texts should be retained.

"Yes, text can be considered ephemeral, just like emails," Loy said. "But as I read the plain language of L.A.'s own administrative code, the city imposed upon itself a more stringent record retention requirement than state law might otherwise require."

Kelly Aviles, an attorney and public records expert who has represented The Times in unrelated litigation, said the explanation offered by Bass' lawyer is flawed.

A mayor does not get to determine what is or is not a public record based on the device used, Aviles said, adding that such logic would invite officials to delete emails and voicemails they deem "ephemeral."

Under the state public records act, Aviles said, "it's the content of the communication, not the method of communication, that is important. If it relates to the conduct of public business, it is a public record that's disclosed.

"The idea that they think they can delete whatever they want, whenever they want, is not in compliance with the law at all," she said.

Aviles also took issue with Michaelson's citing of the city code.

"The city code doesn't trump state law," Aviles said. "The fact that they have an inaccurate understanding of what state law requires doesn't help them."

In response to public records requests, other agencies and public officials have released a multitude of records from the early days of the fire. California law dictates the release of these kind of records, unless there is a specific exemption.

Bass left Accra, Ghana, about 9 p.m. on Jan. 7, or 1 p.m. Los Angeles time, as the fire grew, traveling the first leg on a military plane, where she was able to make phone calls and communicate by text and email.

Early the next morning, she boarded a commercial flight at Washington Dulles International Airport and would have been able to communicate only by email and text before arriving at Los Angeles International Airport at 11:24 a.m. on Jan. 8, according to her itinerary and flight records.

Bass has said that she was on the phone throughout the military flight from Accra to Dulles, and her staff id she was actively in- ed in decision-making ile abroad. She was also communicating via text message during that leg of her trip, according to at least one public official.

Los Angeles County Supervisor Kathryn Barger said Jan. 8 that she had been texting with Bass the night before until 10:30 p.m. Los Angeles time, which would have meant they were texting as Bass flew from Africa to Washington, D.C.

"Trust me, she's very engaged. Very engaged," Barger, whose district includes the Eaton fire zone, said Jan. 8 of Bass and her texts.

In response to a public records request from The Times, Supervisor Lindsey Horvath's office released a text message exchange between her and Bass.

At 11:50 a.m. Los Angeles time on Jan. 7, Horvath, whose district includes Pacific Palisades, texted Bass.

"Reaching out about Palisades fire. I understand our County Fire Dept is supporting City and our Office of Emergency Management has been in touch with City staff, also. Do you need additional help/ support? Anything you want to put on our radar at this time?" Horvath wrote Bass in a text that Horvath's office provided in response to a public records request from The Times.

Bass responded at 1:07 p.m. Los Angeles time, or just after 9 p.m. Ghana time, when she would have been on her way back home.

"Thanks for asking I think we are good—I'll call you in the am," Bass wrote.

Newsom stymies implementation of law limiting plastics

[Plastic, from B1]
president," said one disgruntled environmentalist who had been working on the regulations since 2022, and who asked to remain anonymous because they continue to negotiate with the governor's office on several legislative and regulatory items.

SB 54 called for plastic and packaging companies to reduce single-use plastic packaging by 25% and ensure that 65% of that material is recyclable and 100% either recyclable or compostable — all by 2032.

The law also required packaging producers to bear the costs of their products' end-life (whether via recycling, composting, landfill or export) and figure out how to make it happen — removing that costly burden from consumers and state and local governments.

According to one state analysis, 2.9 million tons of single-use plastic and 171.4 billion single-use plastic components were sold, offered for sale, or distributed during 2023 in California.

Single-use plastics and plastic waste more broadly are considered a growing environmental and health problem. In recent decades, the accumulation of plastic waste has overwhelmed waterways and oceans, sickening marine life and threatening human health.

Villaseñor, Newsom's spokesman, cited the program's cost as a deterrent.

A state analysis showed the law, once enacted, would have cost the state $36 billion and each Californian household about $300.

However, the analysis then noted those costs were "likely to be mitigated by an estimated increase in personal income amounting to $19.2 billion, coupled with additional health and environmental benefits totaling $40.3 billion."

Indeed, the analysis suggested most Californians were likely to see an increase in personal income as a result of the law, ranging from a $3 per person bump during the first year and $131 by 2032.

"The law has always been about affordability," said state Sen. Benjamin Allen (D-Santa Monica), the architect of SB 54. "It's been increasingly difficult for our cities and counties to handle the endless influx of plastics into our waste stream and they have been forced to increase rates on regular folks over and over again."

But others, including Nick Lapis, director of advocacy at Californians Against Waste, wondered if maybe it is time to bring the issue back to the voters.

In 2022, a ballot measure that would have put an end to most single-use packaging and foodware in the state was pulled after industry representatives and lawmakers promised to write legislation that would essentially do the same thing, via SB 54.

The only difference was that the law would allow the industry a major role in its oversight, development and management.

Dropping the ballot measure was considered a mistake at the time by several environmentalists, who foresaw the industry delaying, derailing or killing it.

"Suffice it to say that we just don't have confidence that an industry so prone to deceiving the public for so long about the impacts of its products on our communities and our planet will now take the starring role in its own demise voluntarily," wrote a coalition of environmentalists in a 2022 letter condemning the removal of the ballot initiative in favor of the law.

Concerns about the governor's commitment to the law began in December, when members of the Circular Action Alliance — a coalition that was formed to represent the plastic and packaging industry — began to complain about the regulations to Newsom.

Rachel Wagoner, an executive director of the industry coalition was, until March 2024, the director of the California Department of Resources Recycling and Recovery, or CalRecycle.

Newsom appointed Wagoner to the CalRecycle position in 2020, and it was under her leadership that the majority of the law's regulations were written and agreed upon.

Larine Urbina, a spokeswoman for the Circular Action Alliance, said in a statement that her organization appreciated Newsom's "commitment to the effective and efficient implementation of SB 54," and that the alliance's goal "is to ensure the legislation meets its significant ambitions and to help create a circular economy."

As lawmakers and environmentalists now scramble to pick up the pieces of SB 54, they noted the bill was signed into law — and therefore the law of the land.

"The Governor and legislators ... must continue to insist that the law's goals and timelines are met," wrote the representatives of Oceana, Ocean Conservancy and Monterey Bay Aquarium.

Allen, the state senator, agreed with that sentiment.

"We're hopeful the administration and agency can move swiftly this go-around ... and come out with revised regulation that get us on track toward swift implementation of the law," he said. "When that happens, it'll be a win for both our environment and ratepayers."
